

Introduction to interval funds

What is an interval fund?

Interval funds vary widely by strategy, but all have one important thing in common: they offer only periodic redemptions at set “intervals,” for instance, monthly or quarterly, rather than daily. The potential benefit to portfolio construction – and to investors – is that they can in turn invest in more narrowly traded, less liquid pockets of the markets. This is where investors typically expect an “illiquidity premium” (higher anticipated return in exchange for less liquidity).

How they work

Interval funds essentially combine characteristics of both open- and closed-end mutual funds. Although legally structured as closed-end funds, interval funds differ from their traditional counterparts in two notable ways: they typically don’t undergo an initial public offering (where a set number of shares are issued), nor do they trade on an exchange. Instead, interval funds are continuously offered and shares are issued on an ongoing basis, much like open-end mutual funds.

Liquidity for traditional closed-end funds comes through daily exchange trading, whereas interval funds provide periodic repurchase offers at each scheduled interval. This limited fund level liquidity allows the manager flexibility to invest in less liquid securities of public, and potentially private, markets – investments that might otherwise only be available through private funds that come with higher fees and more complicated tax structures.

Source: BlackRock, as of June 2024. Managers do not have to grant the redemptions at the prescribed intervals. * May vary by fund. † Typically, interval funds are not legally required to impose investor suitability. However, because of their relative illiquidity, individual distributors may require clients to meet certain criteria, e.g., Accredited Investor standard. ‡ There may be some limitations, as funds must maintain liquid assets sufficient to meet repurchase offers.

How the repurchase process works

Investors in interval funds gain the opportunity for liquidity through periodic share repurchase offers. Under the 1940 Act, each repurchase offer must consist of between 5% and 25% of a fund's outstanding shares. However, there is a measure of flexibility on timing and each individual fund will have a defined interval and a set schedule associated with repurchase offers.

Shareholders receive proactive notice from the fund when the repurchase period commences, including specific details on the submission deadline, pricing date, etc. Shareholders are not required to accept any repurchase offer. However, if they choose to do so, they need to indicate interest by the offer deadline. In an instance when repurchase requests exceed the offer amount, shares are generally repurchased from shareholders on a pro rata basis.

While interval funds present this periodic liquidity, it is not guaranteed that an investor will be able to sell their shares at a given time, or that they will have their entire repurchase request fulfilled. For these reasons, investments in interval funds are generally considered to be longer term and illiquid.

Sample repurchase timeline

For illustrative purposes only. Individual funds will each have their own distinct schedule associated with repurchase offers. Managers do not have to grant the redemptions at the prescribed intervals.
